Using common sense is inherent in every decision that we make, on or off wiki. To point out how using common sense is necessary in even enforcing Wikipedia's most basic policies, I will use the example of vandalism reversion. Look at this edit made to the article James Bond. The edit is clearly vandalism.

Decision Making> The Timing of Decisions There is usually a best time to make a decision or to take action. Taking a decision too early occurs when not enough time is spent getting all the relevant facts or information, or when there is some future potential event that could have a significant impact on our decision. Do you remember to use common sense when making decision? The proper use of common sense can actually prevent one from making bad or wrong decisions, so one can make right, clear or good decision. Deciding on anything without enough thought is a haste decision, it may lead to regret (the usual "had I know"). Decision-making is at the foundation of social and emotional learning and is key to success in school and life. These games build students' decision-making skills by placing them in a variety of interesting and difficult scenarios that get them thinking through choices, seeing the consequences, and learning management and responsibility.
