Therapeutic Communication

Nurses and healthcare professionals need to learn effective communication skills in order to build & maintain strong relationships with patients. Learn how...From the day we are born, communication is an inherent part of our being. Communication tools used every day in life include verbal transference, such as that from a mother to a child using supportive and loving words, or nonverbal communication, like a pat on the back. Therapeutic communication focuses on advancing your physical and emotional well-being.Measures. Studies had to investigate the association between communication factors (interaction styles, verbal factors or non-verbal factors) and constructs of the therapeutic alliance (collaboration, affective bond, agreement, trust, or empathy), measured during encounters between health practitioners and patients.INTRODUCTION. The nurse-client relationship is the foundation on which psychiatric nursing is established. The therapeutic interpersonal relationship is the process by which nurses provide care for clients in need of psychosocial intervention.
